When facing one another you will cock your heads slightly, so noses won't be an issue. The actual mechanics of kissing vary as a kiss develops but the basics of the process include: Tilting your heads to the side and leaning in, slightly parting your lips, and you kind of aim to put one of their lips(upper or lower) between your lips and close your lips as you do so. This repeats if you're making out and you'll generally move around by swapping which lip you're aiming for, how deep of a kiss it is, how much open mouth tongue play you get into, biting, etc. You'll get a feel for it after a few times. As far as tongue goes, don't be forceful. Just lightly touch your tongue to whatever lip you have between your lips and see how they react. If they open up more and start doing the same to you, then you go all in and starting touching tongues. If they don't reciprocate the tongue play, don't push it, not everyone likes frenching.
