

If social media disappeared tomorrow who would you be? We live in a world that tells us that our worth isn't how much money and what career we have. We constantly scrutinize our bodies and compare them to everybody's online and when they're not perfect we hate ourselves because of it, it's like we're chasing that thing that is going to make us happy and fill that hole inside of us. The truth is your worth was never in those things. Your identity is now in what you do or what you own it in who you are (a masterpiece) and not because of your success and what you have, but because you were created by God and he calls you enough.
