

the burgandy on my t-shirt when you splashed your wine into me and how the blood rushed into my cheeks, so scarlet it was the mark you saw on my collarbone the rust that grew between telephones the lips I used to call home

so scarlet it was

maroon